Excerpt from The Physiology of Man, Vol. 2 of 5: Designed to Represent the Existing State of Physiological Science, as Applied to the Functions of the Human Body; Alimentation, Digestion, Absorption, Lymph and Chyle In studying the subject of digestion, many points presented themselves which were complicated by a mass of conflicting Observations and statements by the earlier physiologists, and even by modern experimenters; and there are, even now, serious differences of Opinion with regard to some of the most important facts connected with this function. This is strikingly illustrated in the views of different writers of high authority concerning the physiological properties of the saliva, the gastric juice, the bile, and the secretion of the pancreas. Much of this confusion is to be avoided, however, by treating of these questions upon the basis of accumulated experimental facts, without regarding mere Opinions, even of the highest authority, when based upon insufficient data. With regard to absorption, very much has been developed within the last few years by accurate experimental researches, in which some of the sources of error in the earlier observations have been avoided, by remarkably successful experiments upon living animals, and by the application of improved methods for the analysis of the animal fluids. Recognizing the importance of all these methods of study, the author has endeavored to give the most extended application of physical laws to the mechanism of absorption, without losing sight of the fact that the physical phenomena presented in the living body are by no means fully understood. Our positive knowledge concerning many of the functions - considered in the present volume dates from important discoveries. The author...
