Excerpt from Economy in Education: A Practical Discussion of Present-Day Problems of Educational Administration This book is the third in the series of which Psychology in Education is the first, and Method in Education is the second. The purpose of the series has been to develop a consistent pedagogy, based both upon the physio-psyche growth of the pupil as an individual, and upon his functions as a factor in the social organism. The work throughout has been done in the light of current knowledge of individual and social growth, and has, it is hoped, been brought into accord with the safest theories and most productive practice arising out of that knowledge. Education as a science is in its infancy, and no final word can now be written in any department of it. To reach fruitful results in the study of education the same thing is necessary as has been necessary to the upbuilding of any other science, namely, inductive work. The wait for trustworthy generalizations must be a long one, for observation, comparison, experimentation not only must extend over long reaches of time, much longer than in the case of many other sciences, but they are all vitiated by elements over which the observer and experimenter can have no control. The problem, Given, the boy and girl; required, the properly educated man and woman, is complicated with more incalculable factors than any other problem awaiting solution at human hands.
